

Which Loved Him Best?

BY BERTHA M. CLAY.

"Yes, her manners are very nice," he allowed. "She can't be a bad girl, I suppose. Larch! Do you know anything of her more than that?"

"I don't know her life," said Lady Ryburn; "such a brief simple life as has been. She was born in Lisburn; her mother was dead when she was born, so I imagine that she inherits her good looks and her father's. Her father as I told you was an Englishman."

"He died when she—that could be told."

"Yes. And if she were my own child, she would be a most lovely girl," replied the dowager. "With her dark hair, her daughter-like her. She has a strangely noble air about her. Her manner is very wise, gentle, with a poet's touch. I have no doubt that she will be a great success."

"The only thing that troubles me is she is never happy. Her father as I told you was an Englishman."

"She has been here a tragedy in it. I should like to see her again."

"Those days were very sweet to me. He liked to know that his mother loved the girl, who, so short a time before, had been a widow. I am sorry that he did not live for that past memory. But he need not have feared. Carmen would have been a good wife for him. She would have been just the daughter-in-law he wanted."

"Lord Ryburn is a good man. He had been anxious to know if suspicion of any kind had ever come to his mind. I told him that their secret had been safe through death itself had guarded it."

"It was a secret between him and me. The same with Carmen. They had never been together in one house before. It was a secret between them. The secret must under be his brother's secret."

"It was as though fate made him by placing him in the room where Carmen was wedded to bring thither as his wife, but not as his mother."

"He wondered at the ways as we walked up the stairs. He was a good man, and remembered the past. Then he prayed to heaven to help him, so that no unworthy man would ever be his wife."

After that he slept and one of the most painful days of his life was ended.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

One of the pleasantest rooms in Ryburn Hall was the oak parlor. It was a large room, one end of which was entirely taken up by a large bay window that opened out in front of the hall. The light from the sun shone through the room formed part of the oak paneling. Two doors shaded it; and when the sun shone through the glass, the shadows on the carpet, when the birds sing in their nests, were like the leaves on the trees. The stirred leaves it was just as if the room and tree were one. Everything who came in that room was charmed by its beauty, those wished to sit there. Any one who had nothing particular to do was sure to find the day sooner or later in the oak parlor.

The room was a picture of old-world, ladylike comfort, with a piano. Mrs. Drayton asked Lady Clarice.

"The pretty widow laughs," said Mrs. Drayton. "She is very good-looking."

"She is a good widow over forty," she said. "I know my world here, and you don't. About this time in the drawing-room, I am sure, she is."

"Where is Sir Charles and Lady Whitton?"

"They are out together, as soon as breakfast is over, for an hour," said Mrs. Drayton. "They are away all the time in spent in love-making."

There was one of those unfortunate marriages, when the husband and wife are necessary to keep up their love-making. Captain Colin goes into the grounds to smoke his pipe, and Mrs. Drayton does not waste her society on ladies. I am generally alone in the morning. I am very lonely when I hear them coming."

"How charming," cried Lady Clarice.

"It is almost like living in a tree. It is the first in the Hall, my sister, Cousin and sit down. Lady Clarice."

"Mrs. Drayton asked Lady Clarice.

"The pretty widow laughs,"

"she said. "I know my world here, and you don't. About this time in the drawing-room, I am sure, she is."

"Where is Sir Charles and Lady Whitton?"

"They are out together, as soon as breakfast is over, for an hour," said Mrs. Drayton. "They are away all the time in spent in love-making."

"Katherine more than a year," was the reply. "She is very, very good-looking, how many years she is in her prime, he always sees her off first and goes to her. She is a good widow over forty, a woman present, who to him every moment spent away from her is a loss."

"How charming," cried Lady Clarice. Instantly she was at her side.

Mrs. Drayton laughed a low musical laugh, and, as she did so, showed all her teeth.

"It is very romantic, but very disagreeable," she said. "Such a life as that is not good for any one. Even in real life, it may pass in real life; but—"

"But what," asked Lady Clarice. "I do not know what she means. Such people regular hours in a country house, where every one ought to be amusing. Persons of that kind are wrapped up in each other."

"Husbands and wives should be wrapped up in each other, should they not?"

"It would be a very dull world if it were not for such people," said Mrs. Drayton. "Now my husband and I did not even like each other, but we were good friends. We never had one angry word; and, when he left me, he left me all the time in the world."

"Ye did not love your husband?" interro-

"We never thought about such nonsense," said Mrs. Drayton.

"I do not know what she means," she said. "I do not know that she could feel any sort of happiness, he always addressed her in her love cards. Her love cards were always his. When he wished to go through the park or garden, she was always his. Never had one angry word; and, when he left me, he left me all the time in the world."

"Ye did not love your husband?" interro-

"I do not know what she means," she said. "I do not know that she could feel any sort of happiness, he always addressed her in her love cards. Her love cards were always his. Never had one angry word; and, when he left me, he left me all the time in the world."

CENTREVILLE

Mr. Elmer, although you have not been here from us this week, we are mostly all here. We have not gone to Kipling yet.

We have all had a good time, and have had a merry Christmas. Christmas Eve was a grand success. There was a full house, lots of presents and a great deal of fun.

There was a meeting on New Year's eve. The Town Hall was filled to overflowing. Supper was served at 7:30, and the meeting began at 8 o'clock.

Our new organ, built by Mr. Robert Long, has just arrived, and will be played for everyone. Mr. Robert Long, who has quite a name in the musical world, has given a great deal of time to the selection of the best organ.

Mr. Elmer, who has been here since Christmas Eve, gave a great deal of time to the preparation of the organ.

Mr. Elmer, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. and Mrs. A. C. Garrison, is a young man, very pretty, dressed in blue.

Mr. Elmer, ex-M.P., Adelphiington, is quite a young man.

Solid Comfort.

It is not enough to have rubbers keep out the wet. If the fit be not perfect they will draw the feet. It costs money to employ skilled pattern makers, in order to turn out rubbers in all the latest shoe shapes, but the Granby Rubber Co. do it, and the result is that

The Granby Jined Rubbers are Warm and Comfortable—in all the shoe shapes, of the very best material.

Granby Rubbers and Overshoes are known to be right up-to-date. The thick ball and heel make them last twice as long; while the thin rubber used in the other parts makes the whole very light.

Insist on seeing the Granby Trade Mark on the sole.

GRANBY RUBBERS WEAR LIKE IRON.
